A bulk-right to copy license entitles the buyer to furnish the licensed number of copies (LICENSE SEATS) to its employees, contractors, customers, or clients. End-user technical support must be furnished by the licensee. Technical support to the licensee is furnished through a single technical point of contact, indicated below, with the Kermit project at Columbia University.

The licensee is entitled to technical support, software patches, and version upgrades at no additional cost for one year. After that, the maintenance fee is twenty-five percent (25%) of the total license fees paid as of the most recent anniversary of the first license, payable on the first anniversary of the original license and each anniversary thereafter.

A bulk right-to-copy license includes a single copy of the shrink-wrapped software preregistered for the licensee, to be distributed by the buyer, including one Kermit 95 user manual and one technical reference manual. Also included is the Kermit 95 user manual in electronic form; one copy of this file may accompany each licensed copy of the software.

Kermit 95 may be run from a central file server, as long as the number of concurrent users does not exceed the size of the license, and the server is not accessible from outside the licensed organization.

The licensee must assume responsibility for preventing all manner of external access to the software, including, but not limited to, unauthorized duplication and redistribution of the software in any form, placing of the software on file servers, ftp servers, or Web pages that are accessible to anyone who is not entitled to a copy of this software under this license.
